YARNED ABOUT AGES OF SHIPS

British Sailor Claimed That His Country Has Many Staunch Old Craft.

"Taiking about old ships," said British ship Gantock Rock sailor at the Seamen's Institute on Saturday evening, "reminds me, me luds, of the threestick schooner Three Sisters. This tub took part in the siege of Londenderry in 1689, and after being run for a hundred and thirty years, they used to use her for a coaster along the rough and rugged headlands surrounding the Irish

"That's a log rope in comparison to the hawser sized story of an old vessel that I can tell," said a sailor who has been in Honolulu for some time; "you know that these islands here were discovered by Captain Cook. Well, that old mariner made many a voyage in the brig Brotherly Love, which was in service for a hundred and forty years until she sank in a collision at Hamburg harbor."

"Don't you'se be busting into this fo'castle meeting," sai dthe Britisher; for I can tell you facts. Shortly before our departure from 'ome the British shipping register officials carried out inquiries which showed that on their books there were twenty-four English ships over a hundred years old and about twenty over ninety-five years old. They talk about the Gantock Rock being well along in years. Why, man, she hasn't reached middle age yet, for they reckon middle age of a ship at twenty-six years."

The sailor lads didn't talk about the age of steamers, because they regard the steamers as a sort of fish that ruin them. It is hard to determine the maximum term of service of a steamship under the most favorable conditions. Of the steamers built between 1815 and 1830 not a single one is now in existence. Modern vessels can be run so much cheaper than the old timers that it is probable that that early vessels were taken off long before they were actually played out. The oldest vessel in the fax, built in 1830. The oldest English Swift, seventy-one years old, and still in active service.
